Apparently their production is discontinued today, but according to Yopez it is possible to make sense of what it meant for the Murui-Muinane an ethnic group part of the larger Witoto people to produce such wooden statues in the past, through the analysis of present day rituals and discourses. The same principle is at work for nuchukanawhere the external visual appearance of their wooden figures is kept generic, voluntarily avoiding any resemblance to individual beings, both living and dead. La necesidad hace maestros. Whoreceivesagift,sellshisliberty.Englishmodel. Cria fama y echate a dormir. One, among the group of nuchukana hosted in a household, is often said to be more loquacious than the others, and appears often in dreams to members of the household, normally to those endowed with some shamanic capacities, or to older people.
