Ross's Portraying Analogy. For many linguistic studies, the systematic demands of qualitative research are an unknown factor; and equally in qualitative research one can often encounter an unsystematic emphasis on individual metaphors, which results in their being over-interpreted. Howe, James Ali, A. Glenberg, Arthur M. Black M. He presumes that Lakoff and Johnson are correct in attempting to ground metaphor in experience, but he would prefer this experience to be described as mediated rather than claimed as direct : Lakoff and Johnson, he feels, think they have avoided any resort to the metaphorical by accepting the notion of direct emergence, but even this concept depends on a metaphorical view of the world.

By locating the attributes of the referent of a metaphor in fuzzy sets, MacC P. Second, he must also try his best to find a way to accommodate his text to the experience of the target-language reader, and to the way it is recoded in the TL.
